Is Your Baby Really Suffering From Colic? Whether it's colic, reflux, or something else, your baby's crying is no laughing matter. But what are the true signs of babies suffering from colic? Is it really a condition that requires medical intervention? Most parents know that crying is normal, but what if your baby is crying on a regular basis? Some parents don't recognize that what their baby is doing is crying. They feel like they are powerless to help their baby and that they are just hearing a lot of crying. Others may experience mental anguish and feel that their baby is suffering, but is it really a case of colic? What is colic? Colic is often referred to as a baby's fussiness. Your baby might be fussing because they are hungry, tired, uncomfortable, or simply having a case of the 'grumps'. Colic is a crying in which the baby is inconsolable and often occurs at night and in the morning. It is characterized by screaming and fussiness that begins early in life, lasts for several hours, and doesn't seem to subside. When is it a medical emergency? There is no real "endgame" for colic, but if you are dealing with frequent crying, you need to act fast and make sure that your baby is safe and healthy. If your baby has been suffering from colic for over 10 hours a day and hasn't made any headway, you need to have your baby seen by your pediatrician immediately. What is really happening with colic? Most often, babies with colic don't respond to the usual fussy baby therapies, such as burping, pacifiers, rocking, and feeding. They don't get better and usually are back to fussiness within a few days. When it comes 82157476af
